

F III
R

Current Policy Digest No. 20

October 1986

United States Department of State
Bureau of Public Affairs
Washington, D.C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE A/CDC/MR

REVIEWED by JSW

Date 11/14/89

() RELEASE

() DECLASSIFY

FOI, EO or PA exemptions

() EXISE

() DECLASSIFY in PART

TS authority to:

() DENY

() DELETE

() CLASSIFY as

, OADR

() Non-responsive info.

() DOWNGRADE TS to () S or () C, OADR

Following are excerpts of key statements from selected Current Policy texts released in October 1986. These excerpts are intended to illustrate some of the basic policy issues covered, not to provide a comprehensive summary of each statement. Free single copies of the full text of the excerpted speech or congressional testimony may be obtained by calling the Department's Public Information Service at 202-647-6575.

Contents

U.S.-Soviet relations: Matlock	1
Strategic importance of the Pacific: Sigur	2
Refugee policy: Moore, Funseth	3
Foreign Service: Spiers	3
Middle East: Murphy	3
Reykjavik meeting: Reagan	4
U.S.-Philippine relations: Armacost	4
Foreign affairs budget: Spiers	5
Soviet human rights: Pilon	6
U.S.-Soviet relations: Armacost	6
Reykjavik meeting: Reagan	7
Cuba: Skoug	7

No. 870—U.S.-Soviet Relations: Background and Prospects

Ambassador Matlock before the Chautauqua Conference on U.S.-Soviet Relations, Jarmala, Latvia, September 15, 1986 (8 pp.)

What is important to Americans in the U.S.-Soviet relationship? The differences in our values and political systems are important, and we will, of course, defend them. We expect the same from others. We believe firmly, however, that every nation must decide its own destiny, and we respect such choices when they are made by democratic means.

What disturbs Americans is the use of force to resolve disputes, to impose a political and economic system on others, or simply to gain influence and dominance in the world. We find it abhorrent when a faction within a country imposes its will by force of arms and are likely to speak our minds. But we don't involve ourselves unless the force is introduced from the outside.

History has taught us that when one country begins to throw its weight around by military force, the seeds are sown for a wider conflict in the future. In a nuclear age, the world cannot risk wider conflicts.

... one of the most basic things Americans are looking for is a movement away from the use of military force to establish new footholds and to settle disputes. Unless we can learn to deal with our differences by nonmilitary means, we will always have a rocky road ahead in the relationship.

We are seeking a radical expansion of ties and increased dialogue. This would help both sides to understand the other better and would bring both government officials and private citizens in both countries into broader and more regular contact.

President Reagan proposed last fall that both governments consider the possibility of a vast expansion of contacts between private citizens. We have lived too long in isolation from each other, and this has created an atmosphere which makes accommodation difficult. The point is not that all problems can be solved by better understanding—many problems are too deep and too real for that to be true—but that lack of contact and lack of understanding exacerbate the real problems and make it more difficult to solve them.

The real question in my mind is not whether there will be war or peace between the United States and the Soviet Union, but whether the U.S.-Soviet relationship will continue to be full of tension, shaken by recurrent crises, and largely confrontational, or whether we can find ways to compete peacefully and even cooperate on a widening range of issues.

We must expect competition, since the vast difference in the values held by your political leadership and those held by our society requires us to defend what we hold dear. In the 1970s, when many Americans exaggerated the degree of understanding which had been achieved, it was Soviet leaders who reminded us that there could be no slackening of what they called the "ideological struggle." We took note of this reality, and we accept its implications.

Nevertheless, these differences and this competition need not prevent increasing cooperation in many areas where we—and other countries of the world--face common problems. Surely the most urgent of these problems are diminishing the use of force to resolve political and social conflicts, reducing the level of arms in the world, and establishing patterns of broad and open contact and communication between our countries and throughout the world community.

No. 87:—The Strategic Importance of the Emerging Pacific

Assistant Secretary Sigur before a conference co-sponsored by the Georgetown University Center for International Studies and the Pacific Islands Association, Washington, D.C., September 29, 1986 (4 p.)

Today, the implications of daily events in Asia and the Pacific are truly global. The economic, political, social, cultural, and security developments of the region all impact on the international system and influence, in some way, our own lifestyles and policies in this country. We cannot afford to regard the area casually as we deliberate our labor policies, trade strategies, or security provisions. Nearly every event that occurs there must be factored into our own national planning. In very many respects, we depend on the Asian-Pacific region, just as it depends on us. Our relationship is one of broad interdependence and reciprocal influence. The United States must respond realistically to this fact.

Our own interests and goals in the Asian and Pacific region have been carefully identified, and they must be just as clearly articulated so that they are well understood by all. The United States has an abiding interest in the continuing peace, political stability, and economic prosperity of the entire region. For this reason, we actively strive to nurture closer cooperation and consultations on a broad spectrum of common concerns. In support of our major defense commitments, we seek to maintain the overall strategic balance among major powers in the region which ensures our own operational ability, maneuverability, and access in time of crisis. This important goal necessarily depends upon the reliability of our regional partners in considering their portion of political and security responsibilities. And, of course, we endorse and support broader democratization and respect for human rights wherever deficiencies exist, as well as the strengthening of the open market trading system for greater common prosperity.

For our part, we pledge sensitive leadership and ample support to our regional friends without attempting to dictate or dominate local processes.

There is, today, a detectable phenomenon of rising antinuclear sentiment in some quarters of the South Pacific. It stems, in part, from the natural human aversion to weapons of mass destruction and, in part, from past practices of nuclear testing in the area by the United States and others. We understand that sentiment. The United States has, for years, been at the forefront of efforts to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to enforce rigid global standards of nuclear safety. We have neither the desire nor the intention to foist nuclear armaments onto others.

I want very much to assure this audience that the U.S. Government understands the concerns expressed in the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty. We are giving the treaty and its protocols serious, high-level study.

We do have, however, wide-ranging global responsibilities. These require that we examine carefully and in detail the full implications of any treaty undertaking that would limit our ability to defend free world interests. I believe the leaders of the region understand that obligation and would not wish my government to act in any less responsible manner.

Very recently—within the past 3 or 4 years—the Soviet Union has demonstrated newfound, virtually unprecedented interest in the Pacific states. They have sent their emissaries to explore commercial and diplomatic opportunities in the area. The reception has been largely skeptical, tentative, and quite limited in scope. Moscow is discovering, in its belated arrival, that its reputation has preceded it. As Pacific governments weigh the benefits of commercial cooperation against the risks of association with the polar bear from the north, they cautiously consider the price of political dependence that inevitably accompanies economic dependence on the Soviet Union.

For our part, we do not view the recent Soviet initiatives in the South Pacific with particular alarm or distress. We do, however, sense the importance of preventing the area's conversion into yet another arena of major power confrontation. This consideration calls into question the long-range role and goals of the Soviet Union in penetrating this area of the Pacific.

...one of the most fascinating and encouraging phenomena operating in the Pacific Basin region today is the trend toward a sense of community. In a region as diverse as this—culturally, geographically, politically, religiously, and historically—it is a dramatic development when nations begin to think in terms of common interests and commercial goals. True, we are a long way from witnessing anything on the scale of the European Common Market. But for 6 years now, private representatives from many of the regional states and islands have met periodically, under the auspices of the nonofficial Pacific Economic Cooperation Conference (PECC), to review and deliberate upon trade and resource policies as they affect regional well-being. The PECC will meet in plenary session for the fifth time this November in Vancouver to discuss such issues as fisheries cooperation and development, direct foreign investment in the region, and the supply and distribution of minerals and energy resources. Their conclusions and recommendations are nonbinding on any government. Yet, perhaps more important than any product they might produce is the fact that this dialogue exercise has achieved an aspect of regularity and a new sense of commonality.

The PECC is just one outgrowth of a subtle, delicate, organic process that reflects the growing concept of common identity among Asian-Pacific nations. And the Pacific islands are very much a part of that process. Indeed, with the "Pacific way" of cooperation and consensus as their guide, the leaders of the island Pacific can play a vital stewardship role in this process. Gradually, habits of cooperation and consultation are becoming well established. No doubt in the years ahead we will see the plethora of bilateral economic arrangements in the region yield, here and there, to bold multilateral initiatives to foster common prosperity.

DECLASSIFIED

No. 872—U.S. Refugee Policy and Programs for FY 1987

Ambassador Moore before the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy of the Senate Judiciary Committee on September 16, and Acting Director Funseth before the House Committee on the Judiciary on September 26, 1986, Washington, D.C. (4 pp.)

... the Department of State is responsible for the management of programs for initial resettlement services—commonly known as "reception and placement" services—under which the private voluntary agencies provide transitional assistance to refugees for their first 90 days in the country. Two of our principal tools for administering this program are the Bureau's cooperative agreement, or contract, with the voluntary agencies and onsite monitoring.

Onsite monitoring reinforces the bureau's regular review of the private voluntary agencies' financial reporting, tracking of refugee placements, oversight of sponsorship assurances, and ongoing liaison with the agencies. We believe that the oversight mechanism and the monitoring reports, which we share with the committee staff as well as with the State coordinators and Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR), further demonstrate our commitment to press actively for improvements in voluntary agency resettlement performance and accountability. We have worked diligently with the voluntary agencies to assist them in improving their own internal monitoring capabilities and performance.

The focus on the management responsibilities of the voluntary agencies was the thrust of the April 1986 General Accounting Office report, which recommended that the bureau:

- First, clarify program goals;
- Second, establish performance standards; and
- Third, enhance financial reporting and accountability.

I am pleased to report that we have made substantial progress in all three of these areas.

- New financial reporting requirements have been put into effect, retroactive to April 1, 1986.
- New program guidelines and performance standards have been agreed to between the bureau and the voluntary resettlement agencies. These guidelines address, inter alia, required resettlement services, documentation and monitoring, employment, and coordination with state-administered social service programs.

• A statement of goals and objectives has been incorporated into the program announcement for FY 1987. The bureau will evaluate proposals against this announcement for new cooperative agreements to take effect on January 1, 1987.

We believe that these actions respond fully to the concerns expressed by this committee and that there will be tangible improvements in the services received by refugees and, especially, in the coordination with HHS (Department of Health and Human Services)-funded, state-administered social service programs.

No. 873—Toward a More Representative Foreign Service
Under Secretary Spiers before the Congressional Black Caucus Foreign Affairs Braintrust Workshop, Washington, D.C., October 3, 1986 (2 pp.)

I believe that the Foreign Service of the United States has a major problem in the area of minority, including black, representation. This has been a matter of substantial concern to me since I took on this job. . . . It is my objective, and that of my colleagues, to explore every possible route to achieving a more representative Foreign Service. There are many obstacles in the path, but I believe that these obstacles can be overcome with intensive and purposeful effort.

Ten years ago, there were barely 100 black Foreign Service officers. Today, there are about 250. Since the mid-1970s, about one-tenth of our new FSOs have been blacks. Blacks are now about 6% of the FSO corps, and I am told this is approximately the percentage of blacks in the college-educated workforce. I would like to see an increase in this proportion without departing from the principles which have made the Foreign Service one of our quality institutions. These aims are not incompatible.

The other, equally difficult half of our task, however, is to find ways to encourage the retention of black officers who are already on board and to encourage their advancement along with their colleagues to the middle and senior ranks. In an "up or out" system, this takes time.

No. 874—Supporting U.S. Interests in the Middle East

Assistant Secretary Murphy before the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Washington, D.C., October 8, 1986 (4 pp.)

Several recent developments have created an atmosphere in the region more favorable to the achievement of real progress toward peace.

The Alexandria summit—and the Taba arbitration agreement which made it possible—are important indicators of where we are today in the peace process. They mark an important step forward in the Israeli-Egyptian relationship, the opening of a "new era," in the words of the summit communique. That relationship remains the key building block to Middle East peace. As President Mubarak and Prime Minister Peres noted in their joint communique, the signing of the Taba arbitration compromise once again demonstrated that direct dialogue and negotiations are the sine qua non for progress.

The growing realization in the Arab world that direct contacts with Israel are acceptable and beneficial was clearly exemplified also by King Hassan's meeting with Shimon Peres and the muted reaction to it, including in the Arab world. The Moroccan monarch joined those who forthrightly declare to the world that they are willing to take risks for peace—to face threats from rejectionists who all too often resort to cowardly terrorism and intimidation to block peace. We applaud Morocco's action.

We can have no illusions. The core problems affecting the peace process remain to be settled, to be sure. But there is a clear desire on the part of many leaders in the region to find a way to sit down and together resolve even those most difficult problems. There are many signs that the parties in the region will continue their efforts to advance the prospects for peace, and we look forward to continuing our constructive work with the Israeli Government after the upcoming rotation. The United States remains and will remain actively engaged with the parties as they seek to find a way forward.

It is a challenging period in the Middle East; a time when many Middle East leaders alike are in agreement on the common goal of negotiation aimed at resolving the Arab-Israeli dispute. It is a time when the parties are actively, openly, and creatively probing for routes around barriers. Paradoxically, it is also a period when forces and trends finding expression on resources we allocate to the foreign affairs budget hinder us from encouraging positive development.

...congressional reductions and earmarking of aid levels to a few countries deprive us of over half of all our security and economic assistance to many countries in the world. To be sure, two of our closest Middle East friends greatly benefit from earmarks—Israel and Egypt—but several of our other friends will be severely penalized. At a time when some moderate Arabs are more prepared than ever before to move toward Israel and when they themselves face mounting economic difficulties, we simply do not have the means to offer developmental support.

No. 875—Report on Reykjavik
President Reagan's address to the nation, Washington, D.C., October 13, 1986 (4 pp.)

As most of you know, I've just returned from meetings in Iceland with the leader of the Soviet Union, General Secretary Gorbachev. As I did last year when I returned from the summit conference in Geneva, I want to take a few moments tonight to share with you what took place in these discussions.

The implications of these talks are enormous and only just beginning to be understood. We proposed the most sweeping and generous arms control proposal in history. We offered the complete elimination of all ballistic missiles—Soviet and American—from the face of the Earth by 1996. While we parted company with this American offer still on the table, we are closer than ever before to agreements that could lead to a safer world without nuclear weapons.

We also discussed regional matters such as Afghanistan, Angola, Nicaragua, and Cambodia. But, by their choice, the main subject was arms control.

We discussed the emplacement of intermediate-range missiles in Europe and Asia and seemed to be in agreement they could be drastically reduced. Both sides seemed willing to find a way to reduce even to zero the strategic ballistic missiles we have aimed at each other. This then brought up the subject of SDI [Strategic Defense Initiative].

I offered a proposal that we continue our present research and, if and when we reached the stage of testing, we would sign now a treaty that would permit Soviet observation of such tests. And if the program was practical, we would both eliminate our offensive missiles, and then we would share the benefits of advanced defenses. I explained that even though we would have done away with our offensive ballistic missiles, having the defense would protect against cheating or the possibility of a madman sometime deciding to create nuclear missiles.

The Soviets had asked for a 10-year delay in the deployment of SDI programs.

In an effort to see how we could satisfy their concerns while protecting our principles and security, we proposed a 10-year period in which we began with the reduction of all strategic nuclear arms, bombers, air-launched cruise missiles, intercontinental ballistic missiles, submarine-launched ballistic missiles, and the weapons they carry. They would be reduced 50% in the first 5 years. During the next 5 years, we would continue by eliminating all remaining offensive ballistic missiles of all ranges. And during that time, we would proceed with research, development, and testing of SDI—all done in conformity with ABM provisions. At the 10-year point, with all ballistic missiles eliminated, we could proceed to deploy advanced defenses, at the same time permitting the Soviets to do likewise.

And here the debate began. The General Secretary wanted wording that, in effect, would have kept us from developing the SDI for the entire 10 years. In effect, he was killing SDI. And unless I agreed, all that work toward eliminating nuclear weapons would go down the drain—cancelled. I told him I had pledged to the American people that I would not trade away SDI—there was no way I could tell our people their government would not protect them against nuclear destruction. I went to Reykjavik determined that everything was negotiable except two things: our freedom and our future.

I'm still optimistic that a way will be found. The door is open and the opportunity to begin eliminating the nuclear threat is within reach.

...I cannot promise, nor can any President promise, that the talks in Iceland or any future discussions with Mr. Gorbachev will lead inevitably to great breakthroughs or momentous treaty signings.

We will not abandon the guiding principle we took to Reykjavik. We prefer no agreement than to bring home a bad agreement to the United States.

So, if there's one impression I carry away with me from these October talks, it is that, unlike the past, we're dealing now from a position of strength, and for that reason, we have it within our grasp to move speedily with the Soviets toward even more breakthroughs.

Our ideas are out there on the table. They won't go away. We're ready to pick up where we left off. Our negotiators are heading back to Geneva, and we're prepared to go forward whenever and wherever the Soviets are ready. So, there's reason—good reason—for hope.

No. 876—The Philippines and the United States

Under Secretary Armacost before the Conference on the Philippines at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Boston, Massachusetts, October 6, 1986 (4 pp.)

American support for the Aquino administration is firm and unequivocal. The reasons are obvious.

First, she earned a mandate from the Philippine people.

Second, President Aquino has used her mandate to embark upon an ambitious agenda of long overdue reform.

She appointed a Constitutional Commission whose work is nearly finished, promised early local and provincial elections, imparted credibility to government, and impressed all who have met her with her own sense of command.

DECLASSIFIED

- She selected for the key Cabinet economic portfolios individuals of distinction who know how the market works and who believe in market forces....

- She has affirmed civilian control of the military and placed the armed forces under the command of respected officers....

.... we believe the Philippines is pursuing a sound strategy that will produce significant results in the next few years.

It will require strong and bold leadership and a cohesive government which speaks and acts in support of a comprehensive program for national recovery. President Aquino has shown that she can provide that leadership.

It is obvious that the United States has a large stake in the success of President Aquino's policy efforts. The issue for America is how we can most effectively express our support. These guidelines inform our efforts.

First, we will resist falling back into familiar habits in our relationship. For one thing, this means avoiding the tendency to offer gratuitous advice in lieu of tangible assistance. We have made a good start with the substantial package of supplemental aid unveiled during President Aquino's recent visit. I might add, parenthetically, that there is a corollary for Filipinos: that is, resist the temptation to treat the United States as a scapegoat or to regard massive external assistance as a substitute for domestic reform. The current emphasis on self-reliance is a healthy sign.

Second, we intend to display a sympathetic understanding for the magnitude of the policy dilemmas faced by the Philippine Government. President Aquino confronts a multitude of vexing problems.

.... Americans are an impatient people. We expect quick results. But we owe it to our friends in the Philippines to recognize that everything cannot be done at once; that Philippine problems require Philippine solutions; and that they must set their own priorities and their own pace. We should be prepared to offer counsel in a frank and confidential fashion. We intend to avoid gratuitous public criticism. Candor in private and discretion in public should be our motto.

Third, we should avoid loading additional problems onto the agenda before they require resolution. The bases issue is a good example. Our current agreement has several years, at least, to run. Our next 5-year review does not commence for 2 years. President Aquino has indicated her intent to honor existing legal obligations while preserving policy options for the 1990s.

I am personally confident that our security relationship with the Philippines will endure beyond 1991. Our access to facilities at Clark and Subic constitutes a source of regional stability which is welcomed by the ASEAN [Association of South East Asian Nations] countries, Japan, China, and other regional powers. So long as the base arrangements respect Philippine sovereignty, and so long as the balance of benefits is equitable, I see little reason to fear disruption of a pattern of defense cooperation that has served both our nations well. The time will come for renewed negotiations; for now we can afford to let this issue lie.

.... Fourth, we should welcome the diversification of Philippine relationships with other countries. On occasion, some Filipinos have seen their ties with Americans in kinship terms, viewing us as big brothers who offer protection in return for loyalty. This is a tribute to the intimacy of our connection over the past eight decades. There are respects in which we and Filipinos are family. Yet there is also a certain "hothouse" character to our relationship which imposes heavy psychological burdens on us both.

.... Our relationship with Manila will find a more equitable and mature balance as the Philippines benefits from the experience of its near neighbors and reduces to some degree its dependence upon the United States. Moreover, I see no reason why the development of Filipino links with others need dilute the quality of our own relationship--on the contrary. And we shall use our own considerable influence with other countries--in Asia and in Europe--to enlist support for our Filipino friends.

Fifth, we should express our support for the democratic transition in very concrete ways. Our material support should assume a variety of forms. In my judgment, it should be substantial, and it should be provided up front. We should not be penny wise and pound foolish. Finally, we have made a start, despite an extremely austere budget environment.

No. 877--The Fiscal Threat to U.S. Foreign Policy

Under Secretary Spiers before the National Council on World Affairs Organizations, Washington, D.C., October 15, 1986 (4 pp.)

..... This year, President Reagan requested $22.6 billion to carry out his foreign policy. This figure took into account the need to cut costs, to keep budgets lean, and to increase efficiency. Although only 2% of his budget, this amount would pay the operating costs of the State Department and the United States Information Agency, including the costs of maintaining our 260 embassies and consulates around the world. It would pay for our nation's economic development and military security programs as well as humanitarian assistance. It would pay our contributions to multilateral development banks and international organizations. It would finance our efforts to combat the spread of narcotics and terrorism. Part of this amount would even pay for the Peace Corps and help us improve the safety and security of American personnel abroad. The taxpayer gets a lot from this small fraction of the Federal budget.

However, when Congress wants to cut the Federal budget, it too often casts a covetous eye toward the foreign affairs budget. The current Continuing Resolution cuts the Administration's already lean foreign affairs budget request by about 25%. In one fell swoop, over a quarter of our nation's foreign affairs budget disappeared.

Cutting the foreign affairs budget carries a price. We run the risk of dismantling the most important instrument of our foreign policy: our ability to represent and support our interests and objectives abroad.

.... Our resources are principally people and money. As a result, when Congress cuts our funding, we have to cut people. Because of the financial crisis inflicted on us earlier by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and compounded just recently by the additional 25% or so cut in Congress' Continuing Resolution, our foreign affairs apparatus will shrink even further.

..... There is a limit to how deeply we can and should cut. Indeed, many Americans would now agree that in the years immediately following Vietnam, we went a bit too far in our withdrawal from world affairs. Certainly we discovered in the late 1970s and early 1980s how expensive it was to rebuild our national presence and prestige. Frankly, our adversaries, including the terrorist, would be happy to have us, for budgetary reasons, do what they have not been able to accomplish on their own: force Americans to retreat.

But it has not been the State Department's budget alone that has been affected by these deep budgetary cuts. Our foreign economic and military assistance programs have been gutted by the Congress. By reducing this portion of the Federal budget by over $3 billion and earmarking security assistance programs for several key countries, Congress has forced us to cut some important foreign aid programs by 50%-60%.

If we want a safe and peaceful world, there is no alternative to a vigorous American presence. We may be able to turn off the budgetary tap on some Federal programs for a year or two, then reopen the tap without doing damage to American interests. That is simply not true in foreign affairs.

No. 878—The Systematic Repression of Soviet Jews

Roger Pilon, Director of Policy, Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs before the Metrowest Conference on Soviet Jewry, East Orange, New Jersey, September 18, 1986 (4 pp.)

It is particularly important to grasp... that the Soviet system is not simply a case of good intentions gone awry. It is not, that is, that the Soviet Constitution is basically sound, that the system is one of promises—if only the men who run it would live up to that promise. (On the contrary, it is fortunate that they do not, because they cannot live up to the system's promise.) What we have, instead, is a system that itself is fundamentally flawed, a system that is fundamentally wrong—but a system that delivers, tragically, on much of what it promises.

By design, then, citizens of the Soviet Union are subjected, at virtually every turn in their lives, to the interests of the state, as determined by the Party. With a centrally planned economy, the daily decisions of life, from production to distribution, from education to employment, to income, housing, and on and on, are all out of the hands of the individual to a degree vastly greater than anything we know in a free society. Over this public control of the daily affairs of life, the individual has very little influence. There is no effective franchise, of course, nor any effective way to object to the decisions that determine one's daily life. Indeed, the attempt to protest is itself a sign that you don't understand your own best interests, that you may, in fact, be a candidate for psychiatric incarceration. At the very least, protest is a threat to the authority and integrity of the all-encompassing system and thus marks the protester for repression.

But Jews have come in for particular repression—involvement in cultural rights, quotas at institutions of higher learning, denial of professional opportunities, not to mention outright arrest and incarceration for practicing their traditions—all based simply upon their being Jewish....

In recent years, however, that repression has increased substantially, to the point of a crackdown, over the past 2 years, even upon teachers of Hebrew. Arrests of Hebrew teachers and Jewish cultural activists on trumped-up criminal charges are common, as are beatings and other mistreatment. Is it any wonder then that Jews are asking to leave?

...emigration of Soviet Jews is at its lowest level in 20 years. During the first 9 months of 1986, only 681 were allowed to leave. At its present rate, emigration this year will be down by about 99% from the rate in 1979. Yet we know the names of at least 11,000 Soviet Jews who have been refused permission to emigrate; and approximately 880,000 others have requested invitations from relatives abroad as required by Soviet law. Clearly, the situation under Mr. Gorbachev is not improving, notwithstanding a few high-visibility gestures such as the release of Anatoly Shebaransky and the visit of Yelena Bonner. In fact, the situation is as bad as it has been at any time in the post-Stalin era. The loose associations of dissidents have been destroyed. The arrest and punishment of dissidents has discouraged others from following the same path. We are back to the days of total repression.

In general, we have followed a dual policy of private and public diplomacy by way of trying to improve the situation. In particular cases where we believe we can be effective, that is, we try quietly to obtain relief. Clearly, however, we have had only limited success in these efforts at quiet diplomacy. Accordingly, we have had increasingly to go public in our criticism, in the belief that Soviet leaders have at least some concern for their standing in the international community. Rightly or wrongly, that is, we have assumed that if we speak often and loudly enough, the public relations price Soviet leaders will have to pay will influence them to improve the situation.

There is considerable evidence, of course, that Soviet leaders do care about Western public opinion—else why the intense media efforts of Mr. Gorbachev since he came to power. They care because, notwithstanding all their military might, they can affect favorable deals with the West most efficiently by manipulating constraints on Western decisionmakers. It is democratic public opinion, therefore, and Western democratic opinion in particular, that is up for grabs here—the only public opinion that matters because the only opinion that can be translated into public policy. And let us be clear, more precisely and more fundamentally, it is moral opinion that is ultimately at issue.

No. 879—U.S.-Soviet Relations: Coping With Conflicts in the Third World

Under Secretary Armacost at the opening of the Institute for International Studies at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, September 20, 1986 (8 pp.)

...the United States does not challenge the Soviet desire to play a global role. Our concerns derive from the fact that the Soviets rely to an excessive degree upon military power and military force to pursue their objectives in the Third World. Consequently, we cannot rely exclusively on nonmilitary means to meet the challenge they pose in the Third World.

Building on the lessons of the past, an American strategy to counter Soviet military intervention in the Third World should include the following elements.

First, we should support indigenous resistance to Soviet expansionist moves

DECLASSIFIED

As President Reagan has stated, "Resistance forces fighting against communist tyranny deserve our support."

The form and extent of our help will vary in individual cases, but increasing the political and economic costs of Soviet intervention is the most promising method of deterring Moscow from future adventures. For this reason, we have pledged our support to the Afghan people; we welcomed the repeal of the Clark amendment; and we enlisted Senate and House support for aid to the resistance in Nicaragua.

Second, we should also promote dialogue and negotiation as a means of resolving Third World regional conflicts. We support the Contadora process in Central America, the UN Secretary General's efforts to bring an end to the conflict in Afghanistan, ASEAN's diplomatic initiatives to resolve the conflict in Cambodia, and proposals to achieve independence for Namibia along with a withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

We recognize that only agreements accommodating the interests of the parties directly concerned can have any durable effect. For that reason, in the Middle East, we have supported direct negotiations between Israel and her Arab neighbors. In Korea, we favor direct dialogue between North and South.

.....

A third element in our policy involves a dialogue with the Soviet Union on the geopolitical competition itself. In September 1984, President Reagan called for more regular exchanges with the Soviets on regional problems. Moscow was initially cool to the idea but subsequently agreed to the proposal, and over the past 2 years, we have held two rounds of talks on five different subjects: the Middle East, East Asia, Central America and the Caribbean, southern Africa, and Afghanistan. As part of the review process leading up to the recent Shultz-Shevardnadze meeting, I conducted 2 days of discussions with senior officials to review the results of our talks.

Secretary of State George Shultz and Foreign Minister Shevardnadze devoted considerable attention to these issues when they met in Washington. It is our intent that such exchanges will become a regular feature of Soviet-American dialogue at the political level.

The purpose of these talks is not to negotiate solutions to regional conflicts behind the backs of the parties concerned. Rather, they provide a forum for airing concerns in order to lessen the risks of misperception or miscalculation. The talks have been professional, frank, and wide ranging. No attempt has been made to mask our differences. Both sides came away with a fuller understanding of each other's perceptions on the central issues. On a few issues we have identified parallel or converging concerns and interests.

I am convinced that the strands of our policy for dealing with regional issues—our openness and involvement in the international economy, our support for freedom and self-determination, and our efforts to resolve problems by negotiation and dialogue—make the United States a natural partner for key countries in the developing world. America is a powerful and constructive force for freedom and progress.

Yet a new wave of isolationism beckons Congress and threatens to turn America's back to the world. Support for protectionist legislation is higher in the Congress today than at any time since the 1980s. Such legislation threatens poor countries burdened by debt, the export-oriented economies of Asian friends and allies, and new democracies eager for trade rather than aid. All these depend on an open and accessible American market. If we abandon the free trade system, we will do untold irreparable damage to their economic prospects, forfeit our most significant advantage in the competition with the Soviets, and raise the cost of goods to American consumers while removing the spur of foreign competition from our industry.

.....

No. 880—The Significance of Reykjavik

President Reagan before executive branch officers of the Department of State and the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Washington, D.C., October 14, 1986 (8 pp.)

.....

At Reykjavik the Soviet Union went farther than ever before in accepting our goal of deep reductions in the level of nuclear weapons. For the first time, we got Soviet agreement to a figure of 100 intermediate-range missiles—warheads for each side worldwide, and that was a truly drastic cut. And for the first time we began to hammer out the details of a 50% cut in strategic forces over 5 years. And we were just a sentence or two away from agreeing to new talks on nuclear testing. And maybe most important, we were in sight of a historic agreement on completely eliminating the threat of offensive ballistic missiles by 1986.

Believe me, the significance of that meeting at Reykjavik is not that we didn't sign agreements in the end; the significance is that we got as close as we did. The progress that we made would've been inconceivable just a few months ago.

.....

This may have been the most sweeping and important arms reduction proposal in the history of the world, but it wasn't good enough for Mr. Gorbachev—he wanted more. He wanted us to accept even tighter limits on SDI than the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty now requires; that is, to stop all but laboratory research. He knew this meant killing strategic defense entirely, which has been a Soviet goal from the start. And, of course, the Soviet Union has long been engaged in extensive strategic defense programs of its own. And unlike ours, the Soviet program goes well beyond research, even to deployment. The Soviet proposal would've given them an immediate, one-sided advantage, and a dangerous one. And I could not and would not agree to that. I won't settle for anything unless it's in the interest of America's security.

.....

... It's important for us right now to see the real progress that we made at Reykjavik and to unite so that we'll be strong for the next stage in negotiations. And if we do that, I believe that we have it within our grasp to achieve some truly historic breakthroughs.

.....

No. 881—A Spotlight on Cuba

Kenneth N. Skoug, Jr., Director of the Office of Cuban Affairs, before the St. Louis World Affairs Council, St. Louis, Missouri, October 22, 1986 (4 pp.)

.....

Given the Castro regime's well-documented treatment of its opponents, given its growing concern over the passive attitude of the Cuban population system in Cuba that has tried irreversibly to replicate itself and which is convinced that its time has long come. Not so long ago Soviet Marshal Gagarin said that for many years there was only Cuba, but now there were Nicaragua and Grenada and a light was going on in El Salvador. We cannot afford to turn a blind eye to their struggle to build a new Latin America on the model of Fidel Castro's Cuba.

Let us put a mighty spotlight on Cuba, not only for the sake of humanity suffering there but as a service to those living in other countries whose fate is challenged by the Cuban model. May the illumination of Cuba enable the supporters of democracy and human rights in this hemisphere better to discern friend from foe and to avoid for themselves the tragedy of the Cuban revolution.

Published by the United States Department of State • Bureau of Public Affairs
Office of Public Communication • Editorial Division • Washington, D.C. • November 1962
Editor: Cynthia Selous • This material is in the public domain and may be reproduced without permission; citation of this source is appreciated.

...the world, but they are...
...they have tried...
...the darkness on behalf of...
...allow citizens to a...
...who will have...
...enjoy no rights at all...
...from the suffering of the...
...in Cuba; many were...
...the so-called interde...
...that was accused...
...that has united...
...even if in some...
...is conspicuous...
...the...
...of Cuba...
...Castro from...
...models for others. In...
...has inscribed...
...the point—the...
...to support...
...and wars...
...this...
...series of...
...from 1899 to the...
...present, with increasing sophistication...
...and, since...
...full Soviet...
...this system not only prevails in...
...to be replicated in...
...those who...
...must relieve...
...with a cruel

...the...
...of Cuba...
...Castro from...
...models for others. In...
...has inscribed...
...the point—the...
...to support...
...and wars...
...this...
...series of...
...from 1899 to the...
...present, with increasing sophistication...
...and, since...
...full Soviet...
...this system not only prevails in...
...to be replicated in...
...those who...
...must relieve...
...with a cruel

...this system not only prevails in...
...to be replicated in...
...those who...
...must relieve...
...with a cruel

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT
ACTION SLIP

UNCLASSIFIED
(Classification/Downgrader)

RF

DATE: 10/6/86

S/S CONTROL NUMBER

8631205

ACTION ASSIGNED TO: EUR

DUE IN S/S BY:

ACTION REQUESTED: RE - 6 PM:16

___ STATE TO MEMO
___ STATE TRANSMITTAL FORM
___ TO NSC ___ OVP

___ with Draft reply for signature
___ by ___ with Comment or Recommendation ___ level authorization

___ DIRECT REPLY ON BEHALF OF
___ FOR SIGNATURE BY

___ provide info copy under cover ___ of State ___ transmittal form

___ REPLY FOR SIGNATURE
___ BY

___ provide comeback copy ___ for

___ RECOMMENDATION FOR
___ with Memorandum for the President?

___ UNDER COVER OF AN ACTION MEMO ___ with reply for signature

☒ APPROPRIATE HANDLING

___ FOR YOUR INFORMATION

ATTACH THIS ACTION SLIP AND ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE TO ANY SUBMISSION TO S/S

REMARKS/SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS:
CLEAR WITH:

NOV 8 1986

___ CONGRESSIONAL ___ PRESIDENTIAL

___ IF NO SIGNED ORIG.
___ IS NECESSARY, PREPARE
___ CROSS-HATCH CABLE.

COPIES TO:

☒ S
☒ D
☒ E
☒ T
☒ M
☒ C
☒ S/S
☒ S/S-O
☒ S/S-EX
☒ S/S-S DIR
___ TEAM A
___ TEAM B
___ TEAM C
☒ IA
___ S/S-C
___ MGT. ANAL.
☒ S/S-I (RF)
___ S/OET

___ S/AL
___ S/CL
___ S/ACPR
___ S/AG
___ S/AL
___ S/LPD
___ S/ANP
___ S/P
___ S/R
___ S/SE
___ M/COMP
___ M/CTP
___ M/DGP
___ M/EO
___ M/WHL
___ M/MD
___ S/ARN
___ S/ART
___ S/OET

___ CMP
___ A
___ CA
___ EB
___ H-S
___ HA
___ INM
___ INR
___ IO
___ L
___ OES
☒ PA ___ PM
___ RP
☒ AF
___ ARA
___ EAP
___ EUR
___ NEA
___ UNA
___ AID
___ USIA
___ ACDA

S/UP

NOV 10 1986

FROM: Lindy Trolden
S/S-S
TEAM: A B OW S/S-C
832-0318 832-8336 832-8052 832-1294

0041601400

3 5 9 0 1 1 0 7